the docks, where the pressure is exceptionally severe for the present year. But only the very poor have yet exhausted their resources. Those on those a grade or two above the economic scale still have a few savings and belongings to draw upon when the pinch comes. The sources are, however, so slender that a single fortnight of hard weather would sweep thousands to the ranks of the unemployed and the starving. That is the danger, the calamity against which provision must be made at once. Little can be done to prevent the coming of winter, but the Government can take steps to relieve the suffering when it comes.

EXECUTION OF BANBURY AT WANDSWORTH GAOL.

John James Banbury, aged 22, plasterer and house decorator, who was convicted before Mr. Justice Collier, at the last session of the Central Criminal Court, and sentenced to death, for the wilful murder of Annie Oakley, was hanged punctually at 9 on Tuesday, within Wandsworth Gaol.

The story of his crime. Banbury had known his victim only two months, during which period he had been in the habit of visiting her at apartments in Grosvenor-place, Waltham. She was about 19 years of age, and had met Banbury casually, thus forming an acquaintance which ripened into an intimacy, and marriage was contemplated. On his coming to age some twelve months ago Banbury received under the will of his father, a substantial legacy. He began to lead a more reckless life, and soon became a frequent visitor to the theatre, and a few months he squandered practically the whole of his money. He went to Australia, but apparently unable to get on there, he returned home after a short period. On June 28th he called on his paramour, and in an altercation, which was the outcome of a fit of jealousy, he fired on her from a revolver, wounding her twice, upon his death. Banbury was tried at the Central Criminal Court, and was found guilty of murder. The first trial proved abortive, two of the jury, after the verdict, which was accompanied with a strong recommendation to mercy, explaining that, owing to deafness, they had not heard the whole of the evidence. A second verdict had no recommendation to mercy with it. Banbury's legal adviser took steps with a view to obtaining a reprieve. Three petitions, bearing nearly 2,000 signatures of residents and others in Waltham who had taken an interest in the case, were forwarded to the Home Secretary, and declined to interfere with the course of the law.

No recollection of what occurred. The condemned man, in allusion to the crime, had several times repeated that he had no recollection of what actually transpired between himself and the girl when the deed was done, his mind being practically unhinged at the time consequent on his intemperate habits. Banbury has had physical recreation daily, but under the strictest surveillance, and the prison which is specially allotted to prisoners under the death sentence. The "farewell" with his relations, which took place on Monday morning, was naturally a very distressing character. The interview lasted only some fifteen to twenty minutes. The condemned man sat in the chapel of the prison, and took part in divine service with the other prisoners, from whom, however, he was separated by a screen. Billington, the hangman, arrived at the gaol on Monday. Banbury retired to bed about 10 o'clock, but he was very restless and slept little. He rose shortly after 1 o'clock on Tuesday, and in the final preparations for the carrying out of the sentence were completed. The convict bore up with remarkable fortitude. He was dressed in the clothes which he wore at his trial. He ate sparingly of the breakfast supplied him. The Rev. Mr. Pigot entered the cell and said to him, "I am glad to see you in close devotion to the end." Banbury expressed the deep remorse which he felt for his crime, and a hope of forgiveness.

The last scene. A few minutes before 9 o'clock Capt. Healy, the governor of the prison, Capt. Schuyler, the deputy governor, Mr. Uppeby, the chaplain, and Mr. Metcalfe, the chief warder, accompanied by Billington, proceeded to the condemned cell, where the process of pinning the culprit was quietly and expeditiously performed. Banbury shook hands with the gaol officials, thanking them for their goodness to him, before starting for the scaffold, which was in the courtyard of the prison, and in the midst of a few paces he turned back, and in a low voice said to the chief warder, "I am glad to see you in close devotion to the end." Banbury expressed the deep remorse which he felt for his crime, and a hope of forgiveness.

"IN THE SWIM."

BY A CITY SHARK.

The aspect of things speculative continues to slowly improve, while there seems fair probability of really brisk business before long. Many causes conduce to this happy change. The building society smash-up cleared the air considerably, while the vigorous and successful resistance offered by the Birbeck Bank to its would-be wreckers demonstrated the soundness of its position. It was very pleasant news that the Bank of England had managed to sell an enormous block of Baring assets at a fair price, while from Argentina came intelligence of brilliant harvesting prospects. It was known, too, that Russia had failed to place a large loan, and was consequently obliged to keep the peace for another year or two. These incidents, all of a hopeful sort, necessarily inspired buyers, who further had their hands strengthened by the continued ease of the money market. When, therefore, New York also became "bullish" instead of "bearish," all circumstances conspired to start an upward movement in prices, and as this rolled on, so did public confidence expand. Whether the general improvement will last remains to be seen. My own opinion is that it has come to stay for the remainder of the year, if not for longer. But I do not at all agree with those optimists who talk of a "boom," or of a "panic" in American securities, and I see little chance of their going up by leaps and bounds, in the "booming" fashion. As for English rails and home securities generally, they have very nearly, if not quite, reached high water mark. The stream of investment money is steadily diminishing, and when it dries up, prices will be more likely to recede than to advance. Colonial securities of the best class will probably come into favour with investors, in lieu of home securities. Many of them are quoted far below intrinsic values, as is also the case with Chilean and Brazilian bonds, in spite of their recent American interest. I have not much fancy for American interest-bearing shares; they yield high rates of interest at present prices, but in most cases the security is distinctly dubious. The termination of the Venezuelan civil war should give a fillip to Central American bonds, as it removes the chief cause of danger to the neighbouring republics. As for the time to invest in stocks, it is all very well to say that the market is "rubbish," but they have never been in default, at all events, while the revenues have defaulted for their service yield more largely every year. Any one with money lying idle on his hands might do worse than invest a portion of it in these securities. They are bound to have a good time, sooner or later, and it is well to invest in them.
